

This story's spanking opportunity comes in Part 4, but to make the most of it we need to tinker with the events of Part 1. One thing the injured Doctor manages to tell Jo in the Spanking Adventures version is that she should stay with him and not leave the TARDIS. So when she does venture out into the jungle, she is still being wellmeaning, but also actively disobedient. In doing so she puts herself in harm's way, of course, but let's also imagine that the Doctor also needed her help when he recovered – perhaps breaking out the emergency oxygen supply is a job which usually takes two people, forcing him to be ingenious to save his own life. We might even hear him say to himself that he'll put Jo across his knee when he catches up with her...

For several episodes, the Doctor believes that Jo was inside the Thal spacecraft when the Daleks blew it up, so when they are reunited in Part 4 his first reaction is simple joy that she is still alive: spanking her is naturally not at the top of his agenda. But the moment comes soon enough with the scene where he rebukes her for leaving the TARDIS – only in this version he can be a little more stern with her than he was on television...

Very soon, Jo finds herself facedown over the Doctor's lap. But one thing is not quite as she expected. Her brown pants, which had been so snug at her hips, are now around her knees, yet with all their fastenings still intact. Her upturned bottom is covered only with her panties, skyblue with a narrow band of white lace at the edges. She is as vulnerable as if she had been wearing a miniskirt! 'You've never been able to do that before,' she tells the Doctor.

'It's my own application of a technique used by the Pethlans,' says the Doctor. 'You see, Jo, since the Time Lords restored my freedom, my memory is coming back too. The Pethlans of Pethla are the great tailors and fitters of the Wallarian Group. In their hands, or rather mandibles, a piece of fabric...' He stops himself. 'But let's not get distracted.'

'No, really, Doctor, I'm finding it all most – OWWWW!' Jo's lastditch attempt to keep him talking ends as the flat of his hand lands heavily across the seat of her panties. Jo kicks and screams as the spanking continues. Several of the Thal party sidle away in obvious embarrassment...

... but under the next tree, Taron is trying to have a serious talk with Rebec. She has come on this mission against his express instructions, and her presence endangers them all by potentially impairing his judgement. He gestures across to where the howling Jo is meeting her nemesis. 'Now that's what I should do to you, if I had any sense.'

Rebec gives him a watery smile, just a little too apprehensive to be outright cheeky. 'Then it's lucky for me I'm wearing this.' She gestures to her heavy padded spacesuit, clearly much better protection than Jo's thin panties.

Taron gives an infuriated grunt. He knows this is a suicide mission, knows he will never get her back to Skaro, never again see her wearing something feminine, never be able to give her the spanking she deserves...

The Doctor places a last stinging smack on Jo's bottom and lets her go free. With a sniffle, she gets to her feet and starts to fix her pants. Rebec moves across to give her a female shoulder to cry on (whereas it was vice versa on television): 'I bet your bottom's sore,' she begins, before the scene cuts away to the Doctor and Taron.

But we can't leave 'Planet of the Daleks' without making a minor fix to the ending. Now it's no longer a suicide mission after all: the Thals are going back to Skaro on the Dalek spaceship, and the Doctor gives his little lecture to Taron about not glamorizing war when they return home. Taron agrees. And then he fixes Rebec sternly in his sights. 'And I can think of something else I'll have to do when we get back!' Rebec's eyes widen in fear and apprehension: for her, it seems, it won't be an altogether happy homecoming...